An 11-year-old boy in the American state of Rhode Island recently discovered an unusual example of sea life. He found what is thought to be one of the largest quahogs ever found in the state. Quahogs are a kind of large clam that is eaten as food.

Cooper Monaco was looking for clams with his grandfather when he found the large creature.

Monaco gave it to the University of Rhode Island's Marine Science Research Facility in Narragansett, the university said in a recent statement.
